

We're Building This Together

A note to our earliest Transparency participants

Transparency is new, and every community has to start somewhere. In the early days, some questions may have fewer responses, demographic breakdowns may still be developing, and the results will naturally become more meaningful as more people participate.

We also recognize that Transparency becomes more useful - and more interesting - when there are people actively voting. Until we develop a larger and more consistent user base, you may occasionally see a question return or be recycled. This gives new participants the opportunity to weigh in while helping existing questions build enough responses to produce more meaningful results.

As the community grows, the platform can support a broader stream of new questions, stronger demographic insights, and an increasingly clear picture of where participating people really stand.

We're asking users for transparency, so we're going to be transparent with them.

We don't want to hide the fact that we're early or make Transparency appear larger than it is. Every person who joins makes the picture a little clearer. Every response strengthens the results. And every returning participant helps us build something that becomes more useful for everyone.

So if you're here early, thank you.

You're not just using Transparency. You're helping build it.

Answer. Participate. Come back tomorrow.
Help us build a clearer picture of where people really stand.
